"How often does he visit your division?"

"Oh, he comes in several times every week."

"I really don't know. He just comes in and tooks around. Sometimes he asks how many invoices of English goods we are receiving in the division."

"What do you suppose Mr. Hinds's business is in your division?"

"I don't suppose anything. I am not here to suppose. I am here to answer questions."

"Well, we want you to suppose. Give a guess."

"I can't do it."

The witness finally said that he was not present to shield Hinds. Sometimes Hinds had given him information of reports that goods were undervalued, and he had investigated the reports and found the invoices correct.

To several of the questions asked him the witness said he did not see the use of such inquiries, and when finally pressed for an answer would say he did not know.

The custom of one assistant appraiser of signing invoices for another went back to 1870, the witness underwood. The first day he was asked to sign a dozen in voices. He asked the Appraiser about this, and was told it was the regular custom, and he had simply followed the rule.
